A message from UN Secretary General Javier Pérez de Cuellar, on the successful completion of the debate.

The Model United Nations movement gives important and lasting support to both the present and the future of the United Nations. Through simulations, thousands of participants around the world have been given internal and realistic experience with the nature and functions of major organs of the United Nations. These simulations also give to all who take part an important comprehension of important world issues as perceived and addressed in international organizations.

This has made an important and unique contribution to world-wide understanding of the United Nations in all its aspects, and of multilateral approaches to important world questions. Such understanding has helped sustain the United Nations as it has assumed the much larger role in international affairs recently demanded of it.

It may be even more important for the future that leaders and officers in many countries will have to summarize the experience and the perspectives gained from joining in a Model United Nations. Their knowledge and support will be most valuable as the United Nations takes on even greater responsibilities both for new and expanding steps of defending international peace and security, and for collective action to deal with global issues.

Through its own International Model United Nations, Junior Chamber International has given an important impetus to this cause. Held at the United Nations and with international participants in the spirit of their working body, this event brought the importance and the reality of the United Nations to new audiences in many countries. The deliberations and resolutions of this session similarly made many citizens of our Member States aware of the fresh perspectives and the contributions toward solutions which international organizations can provide. My congratulations and warm thanks for this important support to the United Nations go to President Schaumann and all at Junior Chamber International who not only led and carried out this successful and valuable event.
